The city's budget policies, first in five years, are informed by a recent Equity and Racial Justice Review that gives new direction to the city's efforts to understand and ultimately ameliorate the divide between its neighborhoods and city institutions. At its April 2 Council meeting, the Budget and Finance Committee recommended the City Council approve a budget that calls for an annual increase of 3.2 percent for the next five fiscal years. The modest budget increase includes an $8.8 million raise for the workforce, an $11 million increase in infrastructure maintenance and capital improvements, $32 million in new police patrol and maintenance vehicles and $26.5 million in public safety initiatives like new homeless shelters and a new gang task force. The budget includes a 1.8 percent raise in bus fares and 1.3 percent raise in employee health care premiums. "We clearly can do better. But the budget is a tool. It's not enough," said Budget and Finance Committee Chair Carlene Holloway. "We can't solve the city's ills overnight, but we can make certain investments in the city's future that will break the cycle and keep it from repeating itself. This budget, and the city's longstanding commitment to creating a welcoming and affordable city, do just that." The budget, like all city budgets, funds programs and activities across the city, but no single program can accomplish the work of fixing all the things that need to be fixed. City programs that are heavily targeted to neighborhoods or populations, like
