Golf courses are typically designed to play as if they were set on flat ground. Due to the high speed of travel of a golf ball on a golf course, time is spent after the ball has been struck. Distance measurement techniques include Laser, ballistic, microwave, video, and radar. The level at which these techniques are calibrated is typically not the same. Their tolerance limits may be inflated by real-world conditions. The purpose of this study was to compare the distance accuracy and height accuracy of the bottom surface of various golf balls from the most common driving range in the United States, Hoosier Driving Range. The results of our experiments indicate that the effect of traveling distance and height on distance accuracy and/or height accuracy on golf ball bottom surface is significant. Further research is needed before the accuracy and/or height accuracy limits of balls can be established.
